In response to Ontario Auditor General's 2009 report, the WSIB embarked on a "historical transformation" of its business model. This "transformation" has been remarkably successful in reducing the WSIB's unfunded liability: it is on track to completely eliminate the liability six years ahead of schedule, while also granting employers a substantial reduction in premiums. But advocates and health care professionals working with injured workers believe the "transformation" has had a dramatic negative impact on injured workers. They say that the WSIB routinely disregards medical evidence, forces workers back to work before they are fit to do so, cuts compensation benefits without just cause, and denies entitlement to necessary health care treatments. The Bad Medicine report examines the effect that the WSIB's "transformation" has had on a critical category of benefits: health care benefits. The WSIB has a legal duty to pay for injured workers' health care. Health care benefits are vitally important for people who are injured at work or who develop an occupational illness, both for their recovery and their ongoing quality of life.
